

Pam Smart Accuses Two Fellow Inmates Of Revenge Attack

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. (AP) — Pamela Smart, the New Hampshire school employee who seduced a student into killing her husband, is pressing assault charges against two fellow inmates who allegedly attacked her for revealing the inmates' prison affair.

Smart was convicted in 1991 and has been imprisoned at the Bedford Hills Correctional Facility in Westchester County since 1993. She was attacked last year outside a prison school and suffered a fractured left eye socket, which required plastic surgery.

According to an internal state police report obtained by Gannett Suburban Newspapers, the inmates suspected Smart of revealing their affair in letters to the prison superintendent. The inmates, Mona Graves and Ghania Miller, were then separated.

Graves, a murder convict, allegedly told a corrections sergeant that Smart "had it coming for a long time."

Graves' lawyer, Ted Brundage, said he had questions about who started the fight and added, "Pam is treated kind of like a prima donna, from what I'm told, up there, and I guess she causes problems for herself."

Miller is doing time for drug possession. Her lawyer said Smart was "very jealous" of the couple.

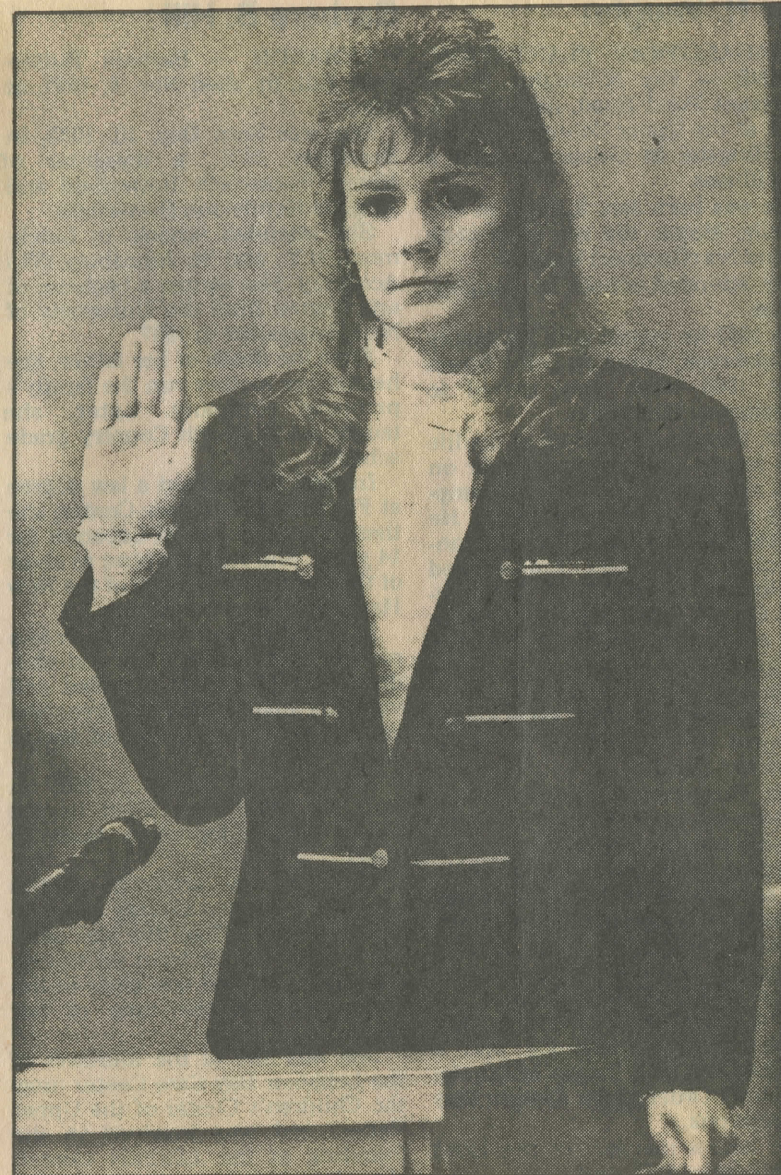

Smart did not reply to Gannett's letter seeking comment. Her mother, Linda Wojas, said last June that her daughter was attacked by two inmates who thought she had ratted on them.

"I worry on a daily basis for my daughter's health and well-being," she said during an unsuccessful appeal.

Smart, 30, is serving a life sentence with no chance of parole for conspiracy to murder, witness tampering and being an accomplice to first-degree murder. She was transferred to Bedford in part because New Hampshire has no maximum-security prison for women.

Her husband was shot to death in 1990. William Flynn, Smart's 16-year-old student and lover, pleaded guilty to murder and testified that

Smart helped plan the killing to make it look like a burglary.
